TREE PLANTING GUIDE

Trees must be planted with due regard to variety and location. A good knowledge of the habit and growth potential are essential, particularly if they are to be planted in an urban landscape, near buildings, roads, footpaths, car parks etc. In these instances one should not plant trees with vigorous, low spreading branches. Surface rooting varieties might lift paving or tarmac and cause problems with underground utilities. Deciduous varieties that produce a lot of leaf litter should be avoided unless a regular clean-up regime is in place, otherwise footpaths and car parks could become slippery in autumn.

Traditionally bare-rooted specimens have been planted in the autumn and winter, during the natural dormant season. Trees can now be planted all through the year thanks to container grown trees being readily available since the 60's. Although planting in the height of summer is best avoided due to the stress on the tree and its demand for water.

Having chosen the variety and location, a round planting hole should be excavated with a diameter at least 50% bigger than the root spread. The hole should not be too deep, unless a pit has to be dug and the soil replaced due to poor existing soil conditions. The original planting depth can usually be seen on the lower portion of the stem and this should be your guide to the finished planting height.

Loosen the bottom of the hole with a fork and incorporate some well rotted organic matter or planting compost (such as Woodgrow Eco-Compost®)

Place the tree into the hole and check the depth.

Next, choose a suitable stake for securing the tree. It is best not to use a stake that is too high. For a typical 8-10cm girth standard tree a 120cm machine rounded stake is the most suitable. The finished height of the stake should be no more than 60cm above ground level. The aim is allow tree to move naturally in the wind but be fully stable and secure at ground level. This accepted theory allows for much faster and more satisfactory establishment. Hammer the stake into the bottom of the planting hole after checking the position with regard to the tree, as it's preferable to position the stake on the wind-ward side (If planting a container grown tree, avoid hammering the stake through the root-ball).

Loosely tie the tree to the stake and begin to backfill, mixing in some of the organic matter or compost. Shake the tree up and down a little to work the soil in between the roots. Backfill in layers, firming with the ball of your foot, making sure there is good soil contact with the roots and no air-locks. Continue backfilling until the correct height of soil is achieved.

Secure the tree with a suitable tree tie. It should be of soft rubbery material and come with a spacer or pad. This spacer should be positioned between the tree and the stake. This is to avoid the tree rubbing against the stake and causing damage to the bark, which could become an entry point for pests or disease. The tie should be secured with a small clout nail about 2.5cm below the top of the stake to prevent the tie from slipping down the stake.

The finished level of the soil should be slightly bowled, thus avoiding any water run-off. Finally, thoroughly water the tree, allowing the water to penetrate but being careful to avoid any water-logging.

On-going maintenance of a newly planted tree is vital to its establishment and future growth performance. So often we see young trees in the landscape having been planted 5 or more years ago still with their stake and tie attached, the tie embedded into the bark and strangling the tree. As a rule-of-thumb, stakes and ties should be removed after the second season, loosening the tie after the first season if necessary.

Although grass and weed growth should be controlled around the base of newly planted trees, physical damage from mowers and strimmers should be avoided at all cost. Often we see dead trees in the landscape that have been effectively 'ring-barked' by mowers and strimmers. Either leave a clear area of soil around the tree (which is probably preferable) or fit a protective guard around the base.

As the trees grow and mature, consider the effect of low limbs and branches, this could mean crown-lifting is required. This task involves the removal of lower limbs and branches, thus increasing the trunk height. Planting fastigate species in areas where space is limited will usually negate crown-lifting in future years. Trees such as Lime, Poplar or Willow may need to be pollarded in the urban and suburban environment to reduce height for safety reasons. Pollarding is best initiated when trees are fairly young so that a growth habit and shape is established early on. Pollarding however is a labour intensive task and is required to be carried out every 2-5 years. In either case, it is recommended that advice should be sought from a fully trained and insured arborist.
